I bet Joe Rogan to be fair got the interview with trump and sent an invite to Harris campaign to give them that same chance, that was what all those rumors were about last week. They probably wanted to see the reactions, and they might agree to one after seeing the trump one Friday.

How are you feeling two weeks from election day? I'm not feeling great about it. My perception could be skewed, though. I live in a rural county in Pennsylvania, and there's Trump signs everywhere. We are split in my family. My siblings, my cousins, and I are voting blue no matter who. The rest are strong MAGA supporters who are voting for Trump.

hideousbeautifulface • 2mo ago •

I felt better about it last week. Not feeling great right now. Especially seeing how trump is imploding and knowing my family members already voted for him/will still vote for him

Some well-intended hopium:

1. Make sure to count "lawns" not "signs." Trump voters love having multiple signs per household and "highway" signs don't count for either side--that's public space so no one "asked" for it.
2. Despite a whole hell of a lot of covid-era editorials to the contrary, families don't "split." That's why a lot of counties in PA are 75-25 wins or greater for one party or the other. If your family is split in rural PA, Harris is doing better than you might think.

I think objectively that our chances are good and I'm expecting Harris to win. My nerves mainly come from the consequences of Trump managing to slip through. (I also expect a horrific backlash if Harris wins, but I feel like it'll be more survivable)

Wtf where are the polls, we're 14 days out and there is barely any polling the past few weeks. It's basically only Republican aligned pollsters who are doing the polling.

There was a Reuters one a couple days ago but the decent pollsters are doing a bad job and are being drowned out by the right wing pollsters noise. As planned.

We're likely coming up on the last round soon, but you're only going to get maybe one more result per quality pollster before election day.

Good polls take time, and response rate has been atrocious.

A thought: In India (where I'm from), there's this thing called the Maximum Retail Price (MRP), and it lets consumer goods producers (like Unilever, General Mills etc) set a legal retail price limit on all packaged goods they produce from milk to soap, taking all taxes into account (since the states can't set their own sales tax rates). It was set up since shopkeepers were jacking up the prices on essential goods, and while it is imperfect (unpackaged goods like vegetables and grains that aren't packaged but are sold by weight aren't covered), it helps a lot by preventing retailers from abusing their position in the market at least for products like milk and salt.

I wonder if such a system could help consumers in the USA (maybe if it sets an MRP for pre-tax cost). It won't stop Kellogg's or Nestle from jacking up the prices, but it will stop Kroger and Walmart from doing so, and this would stop half the possible culprits.

8 Reply

430_Autogyro • 2mo ago •

I appreciate the genuine policy suggestion, but in America "inflation" and "high prices" are buzzwords Americans use to describe a general dissatisfaction. Most couldn't tell you what "inflation" means and, certainly, none of them could tell you a point when prices actually went down. Furthermore, all their spending habits indicate that they're doing comparatively fine.

10 Reply

mcarvin • 2mo ago •

What Autogyro said, plus any semblance of the government setting retail commodity prices would get people screaming "SOCIALISM!!!11!!"

I know that's not socialism. Have you seen the isms thrown around our political discourse? The only one people get mostly right is capitalism.

I'm blooming but just FYI, social media and the NYT comments will have you dooming.

I'm sorry but the amount of "Dems voting for Trump" in the NYT comments are just a bit suspicious. I know Dems are voting Trump from GOTV but the amount of comments there and the Twitter MAGA push is just...strange. Especially after noting that the Tim Walz abusing his students lie was started by Russia.

Worst yet people believe this. In the NYT comments, people are stating that social media is turning towards Trump and that means it really happening.

My view and it's as correct as Nate Silver is that it's a coin flip and voter outreach will be the key. In that sense, Dems are killing it and finding every last vote.

She is a major part of the Campaign, you'd think you'd try to actually know something about the Cities you are reaching out to. Not a good look IMO.

Funny with how this lines up with how the campaigns are behaving.

tresslessone • 2mo ago •

OK so republicans are getting with the program and voting early rather than on the day. How is this so bad for democrats? Surely the majority of these early votes are just cannibalizing from later votes.

IMHO we're just seeing a shift in voter behavior, and I don't understand why that is such huge cause for concern.

28 Reply

WickedKoala • 2mo ago •

Because we have no way to know if it's just a change in voting behavior or an actual gain in new voters.

You're right on. In 2020, people got to vote early and by mail a lot and guess what? A lot of them liked it and are doing it the next election. I guess all you can take from that is it's going to be a Trump blowout. Only thing that makes sense. /s

5 Reply

starcom_magnate • 2mo ago •

Not really good or bad. Considering there are more GOP "never Trump" voters each Election, so who knows what is actually on those ballots.

21 Reply

it's not like anything is tallied yet. I'm sure some republicans that voted early are going for Kamala as well.

7 Reply

antheus1 • 2mo ago •

I don't think we know that it is more Republicans are voting early so much as it is fewer Democrats are voting early, and it's hard to use 2020 as a good comparison. Lets use Michigan as an example:

In 2020 there were 3.3 million mail in ballots requested. In 2024 there were 2.1 million requested. 2020 was in the midst of a pandemic. Those that were cautious about covid were more likely to be democrats and thus the split of mail in ballots heavily favored democrats. So we have this narrative that early voting favors democrats, which it does, but using an outlier such as 2020 as the baseline comparison to determine how the election is trending is subject to substantial bias.

The changes included privatization of state-owned industries, import tariffs, and an attempt to achieve autarky (national economic self-sufficiency). Weekly earnings increased by 19% in real terms from 1933 to 1939,[2] but this was largely due to employees working longer hours

I said it last night but I think it needs repeating. The news focusing on the Hitler fetish Trump has shouldn't even be the biggest story. In the NYT article Kelly is quoted saying

> "Mr. Kelly said that Mr. Trump was repeatedly told dating back to his first year in office why he should not use the U.S. military against Americans and the limits on his authority to do so. Mr. Trump nevertheless continued while in office to push the issue and claim that he did have the authority to take such actions, Mr. Kelly said."

This means that during Trump's first term as president he sought to use the military against citizens of the United Stares. He had guard rails back then, now he doesn't. This information is incredibly important because it shows how dangerous he will be.

170 Reply

Blarguus • 2mo ago •

I think I'm at the cautiously optimistic part of dooming; maybe roughly 60/40 in Harris's favor.

It's tough for me since I think all of the "subjective" signs point to a Harris win for me but I don't want to set myself up for disappointment or read too much into any one data point.

Like I'm worried about confirmation bias so I'm trying to manage expectations if that makes sense.

But I voted down ballot D in my deep blue state and have donated a little money to the campaign so I've done my small part!

20k net increase in Pennsylvania, D vs R is a realistic amount to be positive about since we would get a firewall of 500,000 ish assuming the increase decays getting closer to Election Day.

Roughly 7 million people voted in Pennsylvania in 2020, so a 500,000 fire wall with about 1.5 million votes in would mean Republicans need a R+12 Election Day to catch up.

Why don't the two political parties, or billionaires, or any political actor fund the mass movement of voters to Pennsylvania? You constantly hear stuff like "the literal existence of democracy/Western Civilization depends on 10,000 people in PA" but no one behaves like it is, it's been true since 2016? Upper class liberals have mobility and should move to Philly right? They don't even have to move, just have a home there. If it's such an extremely important thing to do. I feel like we LARP as if we're in the Spanish Civil War but our actions don't back it up even a tiny bit.

Similar to how pro-lifers say we are living in the middle of a Holocaust that slaughters 100M innocent lives and then they're just normal pleasant people who talk about football games IRL.

They tried this in NH with the Free State Project, for a libertarian take over. The goal was to move 20,000K.

NH went from purple to blue in the time it took to get the commitments and trigger the move and most the libertarians that moved went from screw authorizations to Trumpers.

Two articles showing that it's not just Democrats voting early. This isn't a pro maga reply so chill out.

It's a let's not sit here and assume all these early voters are Harris voters just because that's how it went down in 2020 so we're not out here yelling about a stolen election like the maga losers did.

Harris will win but I swear I'm seeing too many people slam dunk it on the early voting numbers.

There has been data showing that a % of Election Day R voters has moved to early vote (see: Carl Allen on Twitter/Threads, who references North Carolina).

Of course, there's no way of knowing how many people will vote on ED, but these are early votes that won't add to the total, they are just cast earlier than they were in 2020.

well here's the thing about early voting...once you've early voted, that means you can't late vote. So every maga supporter voting now won't be able to vote on Nov 5. What does it all mean? Who knows? It's just that we're in upside down land right now and clarity is elusive.

I still don't understand the Maga logic of "the votes are in dispute, Trump wins" when he has attacked the system to create the dispute and distrust?

I'm still seeing that same reflexive "tie goes to the runner" arrogance from the last cycle.

If it's a Harris landslide, the Dems cheated.

If it's close, the Dems cheated.

If Trump wins in a landslide, the Dems cheated.

They win, no matter what. Trump didn't create the distrust, he's just weaponized it the best.

mcarvin • 2mo ago •

Bless his broken-clock-is-right-twice-a-day heart, Chip Roy nailed it...just days before January 6:

> Jan. 3 is, per the Constitution, the swearing-in day for members of Congress. And members of Congress can't only object to accepting a given state's electoral slate, but they can also object to the seating of fellow members. So if the presidential race was suspect, Roy reasoned logically, why not the elections of his fellow members of Congress from those same states?

OkSecretary1231 • 2mo ago •

That's the whole point of why he's doing it. His cultists don't see him creating the distrust. They think he's pointing out corruption that already exists. When in fact he's making it up.

Well the latest early voting reports show Texas finally evened out. For a while it was shockingly close between R/D and was showing that 90% of returned ballots were 65+.

The source NBC uses for their data runs somewhere between 0.5-1 day behind actual early vote numbers reported by the counties. Must have been a less-than-statewide report that came in this time yesterday.

All the major higher quality polls are still where they have been for the past couple of months. Harris slightly ahead but within the margin of error. It's going to be tight but I'd rather be in the Harris camp than the Trump camp going into the final stretch.

Copying from my comment from a few days ago because it’s still relevant:

I want everyone to hear this and that includes me for my own sanity. I have some hopium from a perspective that has nothing to do with the election. Whoever wins, remember that we always have each other. Fred Rogers says look for the helpers. I wanna take this further and say be the helpers. Go outside, talk to people, volunteer for service projects, we aren’t as divided as some people want us to be.

I wish the Harris campaign would put out some ads focusing on Trump's repeated promises to end the Department of Education.

I'm sure they have focus groups to consider messaging options, but I can't help but feel that that one would resonate.
